Shaping the global health agenda: Women, children and society

Tuesday 27 - Wednesday 28 March 2012

Aim
This two day conference highlights the unacceptable inequality which prejudices stability in society with specific focus on issues pertaining to women and children. Some of this agenda is naturally controversial, distressing and difficult to discuss. This conference debates and discusses these challenging problems whilst, simultaneously seeking to understand how international aid can be directed in the most effective way.

Objectives

- Understand the nature of the societal inequalities which restrict access to healthcare for women and children
- Explore the causes of domestic violence against women and children and offer potential solutions
- Question the efficacy of overseas aid in certain environments and understand where aid is most effective
- Examine the cultural differences which impact upon healthcare for women and children, particularly during pregnancy
- Understand the role of the human rights agenda in promoting stability in health and in society
- Learn about the experience of Global Partnership Development and current priorities in the allocation of the aid budget
- Share good practice via poster display session.

Who should attend?

Anyone working within the field of Global Health, or with an interest of pursuing work in this area
